

Tracey Makokis is currently the Manager for Indigenous Initiatives, Victims Services, Alberta Justice and Solicitor General.

Although not an Indigenous person, Tracey did grow up on a Cree reserve in North-Eastern Alberta. This unique circumstance, coupled with the fact that her family actively practices traditional spirituality, has resulted in Tracey being gifted with the ability to 'walk in both worlds.' As such, she maintains a high level of sensitivity and understanding about Indigenous peoples. Tracey considers herself an 'ally' working hard to bridge cultural understanding between two very diverse (and often oppositional) world views.

Tracey has been married to her husband, Neil, for 30+ years. They have two children, Kyle and Tiawah, and are godparents and foster parents to a multitude! A fairly recent role Tracey is very proud to claim is the new title of "Kokum."

Tracey has a Master of Social Work degree and is currently contemplating on pursuing her PhD.
